If the perfumes of Biblical times lacked the delicacies of the floral oils of the fields of France and the modern developments of the science of chemistry, none could complain that they were too evanescent. The perfumes were enclosed in bottles, frequently made The Science and Art of Perfumery glass, some of which could easily pass for a perfume container of today. It gives oils of good yields, does not cost much to operate, consumes no large quantities of raw materials other than the usually abundant water and fuel, and the same apparatus can generally be used for numerous types of plants.
